downtown Greensboro. At about 56 feet long and 8 ft high, the mural celebrates all kinds of arts and communities. It has a background of swirling waves representing the colors of their branding and suggesting the notion of arts creating ripples in society. The mural is in progress and Raman is creating a lot of line drawn figures of dancers, singers, and artists from different cultures and ethnicities. The figures are intended to be black and white because this wall will feature around 25 to 30 photographs of the art events happening in the city on a rotational basis. The black and white figures will make for an engaging doodle wall that will not overshadow the photographs also on the wall at the same time. Raman remarks that "It also gives me an opportunity to display strong undulating line-work, something that is my favorite element

Raman painted another small mural in downtown Greensboro on an exterior wall. He painted a large powerful hand with out-stretched fingers that he named "Unity is the Lifeline". It was an impromptu mural that happened when he came across Philip Marsh who was writing on the wall and asked Raman to join him. Raman came up with this idea and painted it in a quick 20-30 minutes. It stands out and can be spotted outside the
